

Have read this missive regards refund points. Have noted that the manufacturer, distributor and retailer seem to get out of having a stake in this.
It is obvious that the products that are captured by the CDs are transported to even remote or very remote places for sale to the consumer.
That being the case why is the retailer/distributor and manufacturer not forced to take the empty containers back?
They have the distribution of the product sorted so it should not be a challenge to take the product back thus negating the necessity to set up refund points.

Or is this too simple a solution?
